Problem

Building out a design portfolio can feel overwhelming

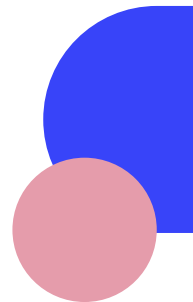

- Must meet the expectations of employers, but also go hand-in-hand with your own personal style
- May lead to designers experiencing a rut

Analysis of the Problem

A strong UX design portfolio is crucial for career advancement

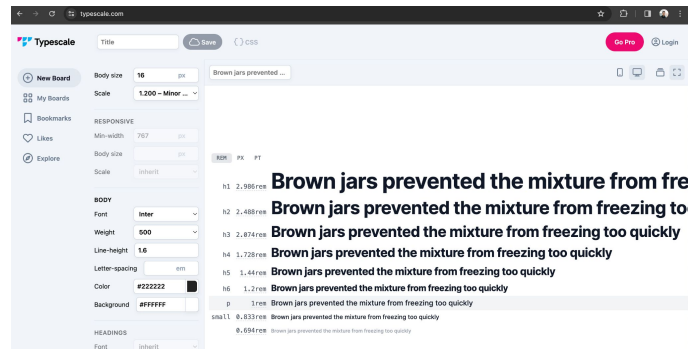

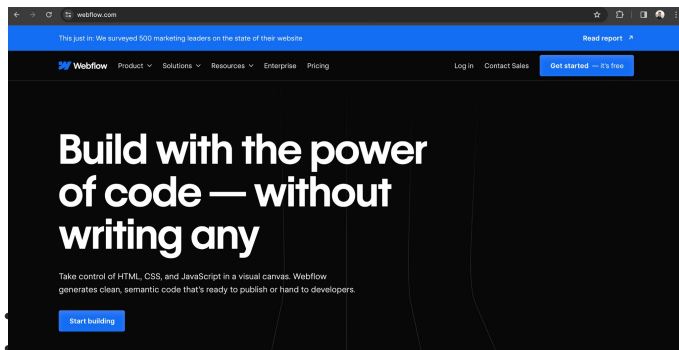

- Designers need a competitive advantage over other applicants
- Creative ruts prevent designers from exploring new ideas and bring feelings of burnout
- Designers need a space to experiment around and consolidate their work on a live website

Key Insights

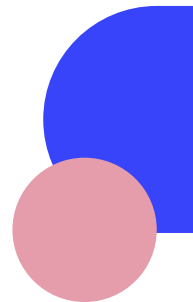

With portfolio design, technical skill often can't keep up with creativity...

1. Ideas or inspirations from other designers go unincorporated due to lack of front-end coding knowledge or complicated web-builders
2. Integrating font pairings and mood boards are often tailored towards graphic design, and not integrated into web-builders.
3. Difficulty determining how original your presentation and content is.

3. Content and case study curation

The screenshot displays the 'Content' tab of the Design Solutions AI portfolio builder. The interface includes a top navigation bar with 'Moodboard', 'Typography', 'Content' (selected), and 'Layout'. Below the navigation bar are two buttons: 'Add new project' and 'Add new case study'. The main content area is divided into two panels. The left panel, titled 'About Me', contains form fields for 'Full name', 'Short bio', 'Role & industry of interest', 'Contact information', 'Theme', and a 'Profile Picture' section with a file upload icon. The right panel, titled 'Projects', contains form fields for 'Project title', 'Project date', 'Description', 'Additional Information', 'Theme', and a 'Files' section with options to 'Add a website' and 'Add an image'.
